

WORLD'S STOCKS DECLINE

UNDER LIQUIDATION

Short Selling Influenced by Unfavorable Money Conditions.

PRESENTS A PARADOX

Wall Street Expects a Still Lower Range of Prices for Several Days to Come.

EFFECT OF TREASURY RELIEF

Short Sighted Speculators Inclined to Regard Government Aid as Inexhaustible.

Paradoxical as it may appear, as prices declined under liquidation and short selling during the week stocks improved in value.

This may not be a comforting thought to over extended bull speculators who have lost by the declines or who are hanging on the ragged edge hoping for some upward swing in prices which will enable them to get out with only a small loss or with, perhaps, some profit.

Nevertheless, the value of which, if they have present value, is determined by the income standpoint, improve as they decline, for the lower they go while their yield remains the same the more they return in the percentage of dividend or interest based upon the purchase money.

In calling attention to this seeming paradox, the fact is not overlooked that some securities have a prospective value in the future through possible increase of dividends or developments of new nature or another which render it difficult to gauge the value solely by the prevailing selling price, the going rate of money and the present amount of dividends or interest that they return. All that is well enough in its way, but it does not concern the speculative holder, who is carrying more securities than he ought to upon margins, as much as it does the real holder, who has paid cash for them. The speculative holder perfectly right in his belief of future development or increase in dividends, but that does not help him at all if his funds are gone, his credit exhausted and he is sold out.

Price and Value.

No one can determine this question of price and value precisely any more than one can determine the value of unimproved property. It is one of a few, and it cannot be determined for every member of the community at any given time. But in a general way, whether purchased with an expectation of enhancement through increased dividends or important impending development, the cheaper the price at which one can buy them for cash, the greater the profit and the better the results in the end. If securities so bought are used as a basis of credit and the price declines, quite naturally the purchaser suffers all the benefits of the decline. A temporary decline will reduce the value of the security as collateral, and this alone or in combination with other influences may deprive a person of the full benefits of his bargain. That is another matter, however.

The horizon of the average speculator is apparently most limited. It does seem strange that they can only see improvement in high and still higher prices. Business men who know the merchant's maxim that "Goods well bought are half sold" act as though the buying and selling of securities were a thing apart from the principles governing the buying and selling of four yard sheeting, standard prints or any other articles. They know of their own experience that to buy these cheap is good business, and they haggle over price and terms and "dating" to reduce the cost to the lowest notch. Yet when they turn their attention to stock they seem to want to buy when all the reckless crew in the market is paying high prices for them. When these same securities are declining, however, and are valuable, as gauged by income yield, more
